Finding of Coroner's Jury in Martins

Easton, Pa., May 4.—"By the evidence before us we conclude that the accident was caused by a defective troadleed," was the finding of the coroner's Jury in Phillipsburg, N. J., after the inquest over the victims of the Areck on the Pennsylvania railroad at Martins Creek last Saturday. This finding was made relative to the death of Eleanor Rutherford, the Uties chool teacher, who died from her injuries in the Easton Assisted Coroner Kinney in his investigation, and that he would have liked a more explicit verdict.

Vocational Training.

The address of the afternoon was by Charles H. Prosser of Boston, deputy commissioner of the Massachusetts state board of education, and concluded the convention, Mr. Prosser spoke for more than an hour and covered his subject in a comprehensive manner, speaking upon Standards and Problems in Vocational Training.

The home, he said, was the original vocational trainer, then the factory took over a portion of this work, and now we have come to schools to give

Vocational Schools for Girls.

Vocational Schools for Girls was the topic of the address by Miss Helen R. Hildreth of New Britain. There are three parts to vocational training, industrial, agricultural and household. The great question is how to make the work fit the girl. The work for the boy is and has always been well defined, but for the girl the chief of the three things is the household, and to a large extent the trade schools have taken the place of the training at a large extent the trade schools have the industrial school can only be reached taken the place of the training at ed on the apperceptive basis, leading him from the known to the unknown.

Because they do not have the patience to gether with it, many mothers have given up the home training abstract side on which the book appears to the industrial school can only be reached in th Because they do not have the patience to gother with it, many mothers have given up the home training and work which was formerly done at proached them and we are to build up courses in science, arithmetic, drawing and other subjects on the things in and other subjects on the things the fellow needs to know in the shop. ing is done outside, as is the preserving and other duties, machinery doing the work formerly done by hand in the fellow needs to know in the shop. To accomplish this he advocated the project method, which he explained was the doing of something in the doing of which a definite educational training was achieved, such as designing, drawing the plans and specifications, figuring the cost of labor and stock for making a table and then when completed comparing the actual figures with the estimates. All this involved training in English, arithmetic, and drawing, and was thoroughly educative.

Vocational schools should be finishing Vocational schools should be finishing schools and not preparatory schools, or they would miss their purpose. The time they have in the boy's life is precious and the school is to be measured by the effectiveness with which it turns the boy out fitted to push him forward in life. He referred to the problem in Massachusetts and in New England generally of the unskilled worker, particularly the girl in factories, who might spend about six years in an unskilled occupation, then to marry forty years the home maker. He suggested that there might be some way devised to give these girls at about the age of 12 in school some practical instructions in the household arts, involving real cooking, sanitary housekeeping, needlework, elementary nursing, and first ald to the injured, things which would not only mean most for the girl's life but for the improvement of society as well, and for the project method was adapted.
